COMMENTARY

Another testing quarter! Many pundits are debating the perils of deflation, caused by the massive world wide unwinding of too much debt on the one hand and future inflation on the other as governments proceed to re-inflate the economies with massive stimulus packages.

Deflation, which we have seen over the past few months as the cost of many products fall, is bad news generally as economic activity grinds down because people, knowing prices are falling, put off spending and investing. High inflation is also as contemptible, but for different reasons.

Governments believe that a low single digit inflation rate is close to the ideal economic world. At these levels the economy grows, creating jobs and through taxes levied on this economic activity, provide important social support systems like healthcare, education and welfare to the needy.

When will the world economies arrive back to this ideal position is of course, anybody's guess. In the mean time it is important to hold inflation protection via assets that have pricing power for when the inflation beast rises again. We believe the companies within our portfolio have such protection.

The falls in the world's share markets have been very dramatic and of course, market tops and bottoms can only be called in hindsight. The potential for further falls still remain more than insignificant, however, such near term drops notwithstanding, we believe that within 5 to 10 years, many prices being paid today for quality companies will appear ludicrously cheap. With this time frame in mind, it is therefore very clear to us that now is a time to be carefully buying these quality assets that are on sale and we are working diligently to add to the 10 companies currently owned.

Of course, the psychological pain after seeing market prices drop by the degree they have is proving very difficult for many investors and many of those have or are contemplating selling just to rid themselves of that pain. But as Bruce Berkowitz recently said: "I believe that they're going to have another kind of pain if they have sold quality companies at these levels. It's called "Sellers remorse" and when stocks start to move up, they're going to have unbelievable regret!"

So these are challenging times but with opportunities. We would suggest you contact us or your financial adviser should you wish to add to your current position.
