GENERAL COMMENTARY

World share markets continued their strong rally in the September quarter resulting in a 54% rise since reaching their low in March. This however, is nothing to get too excited about as the market has simply made up some of the lost ground.

We remain very cautious given this significant increase in share market value and the fact that the underlying fundamental problems and imbalances in the world (excessive debt, massive deficits in the West and offsetting surpluses in Asia) generally have not been resolved. Certainly, consumers have changed their behavior in a very positive way, reducing spending and increasing savings, but to the degree that consumers have improved their own balance sheets governments have at least fully offset this good work with increased deficit spending. Ultimately, the Western hemisphere may face some combination of higher inflation down the road as the debt monetisation becomes politically much easier than debt repayment and/or significantly higher taxes as governments expropriate wealth from its citizens in order to settle the debts presently being accrued.

In terms of your portfolio, our focus remains on identifying and investing in high quality businesses that are relatively strong and well-placed to weather any economic environment. These companies typically have good pricing power and earn high rates of return on invested capital – key attributes for maintaining and growing your wealth in real terms irrespective of whether we face materially higher inflation in future years or not.

PORTFOLIO COMMENTARY

The quarter saw a broad continuation of prices rebounding with each of our holdings increasing in price and in some cases quite substantially. Of the laggards, we took advantage of the relatively muted price performance at Johnson & Johnson to top up our holdings, and of the leaders we reduced our exposure to American Express whose continued share price recovery has brought the stock to a level that is no longer as attractive as it had been in previous periods (though is still attractive in an absolute sense and thus a more modestly sized position is carried in the portfolios).

Interestingly, Fairfax Financial made an offer to acquire the shares in its US-listed subsidiary Odyssey Re which it doesn't already own. This acquisition will be funded utilising the proceeds of a large placement conducted by Fairfax specifically for this purpose. Regular readers will recall that we held a position in Northbridge which was also majority-owned by Fairfax and was privatised earlier in the year. These moves to consolidate the Fairfax units into the one listed entity, we believe, are a strong signal of Fairfax management's confidence in the strength of their balance sheet. Keeping these companies listed would have provided a source of liquidity for Fairfax in the event that they required funds (through selling a portion of their holdings) so we view the signal that they no longer require this form of liquidity as highly positive.

Elsewhere within the portfolio we have been very pleased with the rate of debt reduction at Asta Funding. This company has dramatically improved its balance sheet over the past 18 months, is in the process of negotiating a fresh debt line and we expect it will be in a good position to make substantial investments into new paper in 2010 and beyond.
